Mr Peter Dollimore - Board Director

Peter Dollimore retired from BBC Resources as Technical Development Manager after a thirty-year career in Television broadcast engineering in 2009. This fortuitous early retirement was a happy outcome of the BBC's aspirations to diversify its bases around the country and to close the ageing Television Centre (TVC) for refurbishment

Peter joined the BBC in 1979 and worked for his first decade in Film Engineering based in the Ealing Film Studios, which has been bought by the BBC in 1955 to produce films for television broadcast. As an engineer he supported programmes including Miss Marple and Bergerac, and also spent a period at Lime Grove studios working for Nationwide and Panorama. In 1982 he took his first management role, responsible for engineer training, in particular helping staff make the transition from film to video tape. He also led the project to introduce video tape handling at the BBCs film and tape library. In later years he moved to TVC where he was involved in leading a wider range of technical projects, and became responsible not only for the technical matters but also the business aspects of major investments in film, video editing and later the move to digital editing systems and High Definition (HD) television.

Peter, known to most as just "Pete" first became a school governor at Cranford Park School in 1998 whilst still in full time employment. He was involved in the initial outreach to Wood End Park Community School that marked the first steps to the formation of what was to become the The Park Federation. He was the first chair of the Federation for five years from 2009 to 2014, and now serves as chair of the Academy Council at James Elliman Academy.

He has supported the new headteacher and the developing Governing body such that in June 2015 Ofsted returned and judged the school "good".
